I was a young boy when I was taken away from my parents without any proper explanation. I did not understand what was happening or why I was being removed from my family. I was then placed into Larch Grove. At that time, I was confused, frightened, and deeply upset, as no one took the time to explain anything to me or offer reassurance.

When I arrived, I was sent straight to a dormitory with other children. Almost immediately, I experienced bullying. The other children began calling me names, picking on me because I was new and smaller than them. They would push me around and intimidate me. From that moment, I knew I did not feel safe in that environment.

The staff would frequently scream and shout at us, which added to the fear and tension I already felt. Instead of feeling cared for or protected, I felt like I was living in a place where I had to constantly be on edge. Because of the behaviour of the other children and the lack of support from staff, I often became withdrawn and was left feeling isolated.

I was allowed to see my parents during this time, which was the only sense of comfort I had. Compared to what I experienced later, this placement was not as extreme in terms of physical abuse, but I still received no real emotional support, reassurance, or understanding. I was never properly told why I had been taken from my family, and this left me in a constant state of confusion.

During the months I spent there, my emotions were deeply affected. I felt scared, upset, and alone. I began to struggle with my mental health at a very young age, as I was trying to process what was happening to me without any guidance or support. The uncertainty and fear had a lasting impact on me.

After a few months of struggling emotionally and mentally in this environment, I was moved again—this time to what I now recognise as the worst place I experienced in my life.
