During my time in this home, I experienced things that no person should ever have to go through, and the impact of what happened there has stayed with me long after I left.

From the very beginning, the environment felt less like a place of care and more like a place of confinement. Every single night, without fail, I was locked in my room from 8pm until 7am. The windows had bars on them. I want people to truly understand what that feels like — to be a young person, lying in the dark, unable to leave, unable to get help if you needed it, staring at barred windows as if you were in a prison. It was isolating, frightening, and deeply dehumanising.

The fear did not stop there. There was a member of staff who attempted to get into my room. The fact that this person was eventually dismissed does not erase the terror I felt during that time, or the fact that I was placed in a situation where I ever had to feel unsafe in what was supposed to be my home. I should never have been put in that position. No child or young person should.

Because I felt so unsafe, I would push a chair up against the door at night just to protect myself. That is not something a person does when they feel cared for — that is something a person does when they are scared and have no one to turn to.

The staff regularly used physical restraint on me, and it was not done gently or proportionately. I was left with bruises. Being restrained in that way, that forcefully, caused me real physical pain, but the emotional damage ran even deeper. It made me feel powerless, like my body was not my own and that the people responsible for my wellbeing saw me as something to be controlled rather than someone to be supported.

The way staff spoke to me was also completely unacceptable. The language used towards me was disrespectful and unkind, and over time it wore me down. When the people who are meant to care for you speak to you badly, it affects how you see yourself.

It is no wonder that I was always running away. Running away was not me being difficult — it was me trying to survive. It was the only way I knew how to cope with an environment that felt dangerous, oppressive, and completely devoid of the compassion I so desperately needed.

I am sharing this because what happened to me was wrong, and it matters.

I was trying to hit staff a lot during my time in this home. I want to be clear about why — it was because of the way they were treating me. I was not a violent person by nature. I was a young person who was being mistreated and had no other way to express how desperate and trapped I felt. I was simply trying to stick up for myself, but instead of being understood, I was made to feel like I was the problem. I was labelled as a difficult child, and that label has stayed with me. But looking back now, I know that is not who I was. I was a child who was not being protected.

The home had a system around weekend visits — I was allowed to go home at weekends, but only if I had been considered "good." If staff decided they did not want me to go, they would call the police to stop it from happening. That felt like punishment. Going home was not a treat — it was something I needed. Being denied that, and having the police used as a tool against me, made me feel completely powerless and controlled.

The restraints were a regular part of life in that home, and they were brutal. Staff would put their knee on my back to pin me to the floor, and they would force my arm behind my back. It was really sore. It was physically painful in the moment, but the humiliation of being held down like that, over and over again, caused a much deeper kind of damage. I was a child. Nobody should have been putting their knee on my back.

I believe I was also hit with objects during my time there, though I have tried to block a lot of it out. And that is the reality of what this place did to me — I have spent years trying not to remember it. I used to sniff Tipp-Ex, aerosols, and other things to block it all out. I have also drunk heavily to cope with the memories. These were not choices made out of recklessness. They were the coping mechanisms of someone who had been through something deeply traumatic and had no support to process it.

The most painful part of all of this is that, at the time, I genuinely thought it was all normal. I thought this was just how things were. I thought it was my fault. That is what happens when abuse is consistent and unchallenged — you internalise it. You stop questioning whether you deserve better, because nobody around you is telling you that you do.

I did not deserve what happened to me in that home. None of it was my fault.
