I was placed in a foster home with a couple called Kerry and Neil, alongside eight other children. It was a crowded environment, and from the very beginning, I did not feel welcome or settled there.

At some point during my time in that house, my clothes were ruined. Rather than replacing them, Kerry refused to buy me new ones. Her reasoning was that she had been told her eight pounds weekly pocket money allowance would be stopped if she did. Regardless of the reason, the impact on me was real. Something as basic as having clothes felt like it was too much to ask for, and that hurt. It reinforced a feeling that I was not truly cared for or valued in that placement.

Kerry was not a comforting or welcoming presence towards me. There was no warmth there, no sense that she genuinely wanted me in her home. For a young person who was already struggling, already far from family, that coldness had a real effect on me emotionally. It made me feel unwanted at a time when I desperately needed stability and reassurance.

I ran away from the home, and the police brought me back. Being returned did nothing to address how I was feeling — it simply placed me back into the same environment I had been trying to escape from. I was kept in my own room, separate from others, which only deepened the sense of isolation I was already carrying. I felt profoundly alone for much of my time there.

Despite everything, I did try. I made efforts to connect with the other children in the house, because I craved some sense of belonging and friendship. But the environment made that difficult.

I have been taking antidepressants since I was fourteen years old. I also struggled with drug addiction during this period of my life. These were not choices I made in isolation — they were the result of years of difficult experiences, instability, and a lack of proper support and care.

I carry abandonment and trust issues with me to this day, and I understand that these stem from the experiences I went through during these years. My mother also had a number of difficult relationships during my childhood, and witnessing that had its own lasting impact on me. It affected my sense of what relationships should look like and added to an already unsettled and uncertain upbringing.

Looking back, I was a young person who needed consistent care, stability, and someone who genuinely had my best interests at heart. Too often, that simply was not there.
