My early years in Edinburgh were marked by emotional abuse that shaped much of how I understood myself and the world around me. I remember being locked in rooms for long periods of time, isolated from others and made to feel as though I didn't deserve the same treatment as the other children. My brother and I were singled out, treated differently in ways that were confusing and painful. Those experiences left me feeling small, unheard, and constantly on edge, unsure of what I had done to deserve that kind of treatment.

When I moved to Fife, the emotional abuse continued, but it took on new forms that were even more damaging. I was blackmailed and manipulated by people who were supposed to care for me. At just sixteen years old, I was forced into having an abortion. I was told that if I didn't go through with it, I would be sent away. What made it even more devastating was that even after the abortion, I was still moved elsewhere. The sense of betrayal was overwhelming. I felt like my choices, my voice, and even my body didn't belong to me.

During this time, I also experienced deep personal losses that were handled with a shocking lack of compassion. My carers didn't tell me that my father had passed away until after his funeral had already taken place. Later, when my mother died, they tried to stop me from attending her funeral as well. Being denied the chance to say goodbye to my parents added a layer of grief that I still carry with me. It made me feel erased from my own family's story.

My time in the Scottish Borders brought physical abuse into the picture. I was grabbed by the neck, dragged around, and forced into my bedroom. These moments were frightening and humiliating, leaving me feeling powerless in a way that no young person should ever experience.

Looking back, each place I lived brought its own challenges, but they also shaped my resilience. Although these experiences were painful, they have pushed me to understand myself more deeply and to fight for the stability, respect, and safety I deserved but didn't receive.
