I was moved into Dr Barnardo's Homes in Scotland when I was around nine or ten. I stayed there for about a year, and although I hoped things would be different, the same patterns repeated themselves. The staff were "hands-on" in a way that crossed every line. When they restrained me, they didn't just hold me—they would sit on me, pin my arms down, and use so much force that I was left covered in bruises and marks. What made it worse was the way they twisted the truth. They would insist that I had done it to myself, as if a child could bruise their own arms and ribs in that way. It made me question my own reality, and it planted the idea that maybe everything really was my fault, even when deep down I knew it wasn't.

When I was moved again, this time to Wellington Farm School for Boys in Penicuik, I was between ten and thirteen years old. Those three years were the worst of all. The violence there wasn't just excessive—it was constant. If I cried, they didn't stop; if anything, it made them angrier. They would hold me down, hit me, and restrain me with a level of force that no child should ever experience. I remember the bruises, the pain, and the feeling of being completely trapped. They acted as though hurting us was a normal part of "calming us down," as if violence was the only language they knew. They always assumed we were in the wrong, no matter what happened. There was no compassion, no understanding, just punishment.

My final placement as a teenager was Howden Hall Assessment Centre in Edinburgh, where I stayed from around thirteen to fifteen. By then, I already carried years of trauma, but the pattern continued. The staff restrained us with such force that bruises and even bleeding were common. They always found a way to shift the blame onto us, making it seem like we had caused the injuries ourselves. It was their way of protecting themselves from consequences, and it left me feeling like I was constantly fighting a battle I could never win. Every time they insisted it was my fault, it chipped away at my sense of self. It made me believe I was the problem, even though I was just a kid trying to survive.

Looking back, I can see how all of this shaped my mental health. Being treated like I was always in the wrong, being hurt and then blamed for it, left deep scars. I grew up thinking I deserved the way I was treated, when the truth is that none of it was my fault. I was a child who needed care, safety, and understanding, and instead I was met with violence and blame. Those experiences stayed with me, but so has the strength it took to survive them.
