When I was placed into Newton Stewart, I was around 14 years old and remained there until I was about 18. Those years were some of the most traumatic of my life. Instead of being cared for or supported, I was subjected to constant fear, cruelty, and abuse from the staff who were supposed to protect us. I was still just a child when I arrived, and I had no idea how badly things would unfold.

During my time there, I was sexually abused by staff members. They did horrible things to me, and I felt completely powerless to stop it. I didn't understand why the people who were meant to look after us were the ones causing so much harm. It left me feeling confused, ashamed, and terrified. I carried that fear with me every single day.

There was a period when they locked me in a room for two weeks straight. I wasn't fed properly during that time — just tiny amounts of water and bits of bread. I remember feeling weak, hungry, and completely forgotten about. It was like I didn't exist. Being shut away like that, with no one to help me, made me feel hopeless and alone.

The physical abuse was constant. They would hit me, slap me, and beat us up for no reason at all. It didn't matter what we did — even if we tried to follow the rules — they always found an excuse to hurt us. We lived in fear of the next outburst, the next punishment, the next moment when someone would decide to take their anger out on us.

We weren't allowed to speak to social workers about what was happening. If we even tried to say something, we knew we would be punished. The staff made it clear that if we spoke up, things would get even worse. That fear kept all of us silent. We were trapped in a place where the truth couldn't be told.

One of the worst things I witnessed was when they forced a girl's head down the toilet. Seeing that happen to someone else showed me just how cruel and heartless they could be. It wasn't just me suffering — it was all of us.

Looking back, those years shaped me in ways I'm still trying to understand. I was a child living in constant fear, neglected and abused by the very people who were supposed to care for me. The trauma from Newton Stewart has stayed with me, and it explains so much about the struggles I've faced since then.
