During my time there, everything was awful. The woman who was supposed to look after me would put me in a hot bath that was far too hot, and it burned my skin. I remember feeling terrified and confused because I was so young and didn't understand why this was happening to me. She would also beat me badly, even though I was only three or four years old at the time. I was still just a baby, and instead of being cared for, I was being hurt by the person who was meant to protect me.

She also used to starve me. There were times when I went without food, and I remember feeling hungry, scared, and completely helpless. Being denied something as basic as food made me feel like I didn't matter at all. At such a young age, I had no way to make sense of what was happening or to ask for help. I just had to endure it, even though it was frightening and painful.

All of this has had a lasting effect on my mental health. Experiencing that kind of treatment so early in life has stayed with me, and it has shaped the way I see myself and the world around me. The fear, the confusion, and the sense of being completely unprotected have never fully left me. I often think about how vulnerable I was and how differently things should have been.

I felt completely neglected during that time. There was no comfort, no safety, and no reassurance. Instead, I was left to cope with things no child should ever have to face. Looking back, it is heartbreaking to realise how young I was and how much harm was done to me before I even had the chance to understand the world. The impact of those early experiences is something I still carry with me today.
