When I look back on the early years of my life in care, I realise how deeply those experiences shaped me. My first placement, which lasted around a year, was supposed to be a place of safety and support. Instead, it became a place where I learned fear before anything else. The staff often claimed they were "restraining" us, but what they did went far beyond anything that could be called safe or necessary. They would forcefully hold me down, sometimes with several adults sitting on top of me, making it difficult to breathe. At times, they locked us in rooms for long stretches, leaving us isolated until they decided we could come out. Those moments taught me that the people who were meant to protect me could also be the ones who caused harm.

After that, I was moved to Snowdon School for Girls on Spittal Street in Stirling, where I stayed for four to five years. I had hoped things would be different, but the environment there brought a new set of challenges. Every night, from 8:30pm until 6:30am, we were locked in our rooms without access to food or water. We were only allowed out in the morning for breakfast and whatever daily routines followed. The neglect was constant and exhausting. Staff members often ignored our needs, leaving us to manage on our own in situations where children should never have been left unsupported.

The emotional atmosphere was just as damaging. Staff spoke to us in ways no child should ever hear, using language that was demeaning and cruel. Restraints were used again, often with unnecessary force, and the verbal hostility made the environment feel unpredictable and unsafe. One incident stands out clearly in my memory: a staff member was arguing with another pupil, and in the chaos, I was thrown across the room. I hit a window with enough force that it broke. Moments like that stay with you, not just because of the physical impact, but because of the message they send—that your safety is not a priority.

These experiences were not isolated or accidental. They were patterns of behaviour that shaped my daily life for years. They affected how I saw adults, how I understood trust, and how I learned to protect myself emotionally. No child should have to adapt to that kind of environment, yet I did, because I had no choice.

Even now, as I reflect on those years, I recognise the strength it took to get through them. Speaking about it is not easy, but it matters. Telling the truth about what happened is a way of reclaiming my story and acknowledging the resilience it took to survive situations that should never have happened in the first place
