My time at Balgowan was awful, and looking back, it is difficult to fully express how damaging those years were for me. There was a great deal of physical abuse, so much so that after a while it almost felt normal. The teachers would hit us—punches, kicks, and other forms of physical punishment that no child should ever have to endure. It wasn't just directed at me; I witnessed almost every child there being hurt at some point. It became part of the daily environment, something we all learned to expect rather than question.

Alongside the physical abuse, the verbal abuse was constant and even more widespread. The shouting, the insults, the humiliation—those things were woven into everyday life. I ran away from the home multiple times because I simply couldn't cope with the fear and the sense of being trapped.

As terrible as the days were, the nights were even worse. The night staff created an atmosphere of dread that I still struggle to put into words. One member of staff in particular, someone whose name I still remember clearly—Winney—would come into the rooms at night and sexually abuse me. This happened more than once; in fact, it happened so many times that I have lost count. The fear of hearing footsteps in the corridor or the door opening in the dark stayed with me long after I left. And again, it wasn't just me. You could hear things happening to other boys as well, and that made the whole situation even more terrifying. There was a sense of complete helplessness, knowing that the people who were supposed to protect us were the ones causing the harm.

These experiences have had a deeply negative impact on my life and my mental wellbeing. Even though many years have passed, I still remember everything as if it happened yesterday. The memories have never really faded. They come back in moments when I least expect them—sometimes triggered by a sound, a smell, or a situation that reminds me of those nights or the constant fear I lived with. The emotional weight of what happened has stayed with me, shaping the way I see myself and the world around me. I often think about how different my life might have been if I had been treated with care instead of cruelty. The abuse I experienced at Balgowan left me with long-lasting scars that are not visible on the surface but affect me every day. It has influenced my confidence, my ability to trust others, and my sense of safety. I have spent years trying to understand and process what happened, but the truth is that the memories have never gone away. They remain a part of me, something I carry with me no matter how much time passes.

Speaking about these events is incredibly difficult, but it is also important. These experiences shaped my childhood and have continued to affect my adult life. By putting these memories into words, I hope to acknowledge what happened and the impact it has had on me. It is not easy to revisit these moments, but they are part of my story, and they explain why certain challenges have followed me throughout my life.
