During my time in this home, I was made to feel small and worthless. I was belittled on a regular basis, and the way I was treated had a lasting impact on my sense of self-worth that I still carry with me today.

When I was deemed to have misbehaved, the punishment was excessive and humiliating. I was forced to do all of the dishes for weeks at a time. Rather than being a fair or proportionate consequence, it felt like a way of degrading me and making me feel inferior to those around me.

I was also kept in my pyjamas and confined to the home. Most disturbingly, I was taken out of school entirely. I was only given approximately two hours of school work, which was completely inadequate for a child of my age.

Education is something every child deserves, and having that taken away from me has had consequences that have followed me into adulthood. I was not given the same opportunities as other children, and that was not my choice.

I also recall a member of staff rolling me up in a carpet. Whatever the intention behind it, it was not something a child should ever be subjected to, and it left an impression on me.

On top of this, I was isolated in the corridor, made to stand there alone and forbidden from speaking to anyone. For a child who was already confined to the home and cut off from school and social interaction, this level of isolation was deeply damaging. For approximately three years, the home was essentially my entire world. I was not permitted to socialise in any meaningful way, which left me feeling completely alone and cut off from any sense of normal childhood life.

There were times when the situation became so unbearable that I ran away.

On one occasion, I managed to travel by train to Aberdeen and then on to Dundee. The train was delayed, and we ended up in a taxi, but we had to flee from it as well. During all of this we lost our bags, which meant we lost our clothes too. The weather was terrible — it was raining heavily and bitterly cold, and we were soaked through and freezing. It was a desperate situation for a child to be in. When I was eventually returned to the home, instead of being shown any care or concern, I was punished further by not being allowed to change out of my wet clothes. That memory has never left me.

The cumulative effect of everything I experienced in that home has been significant and long-lasting. I now suffer from severe anxiety, depression, and difficulties with my mental health. I have no doubt that what I was put through during those years contributed greatly to the struggles I face today. I deserved to be cared for, protected, and supported. Instead, I was punished, isolated, and made to feel that I did not matter.

Of all the places I have been, this is the one that has had the single biggest impact on my life. What happened here, and what failed to happen here, set the course for years of hardship that I am still living with today.

The support I received was non-existent. I was essentially left to fend for myself. We were given £28 per week to live off, which was simply not enough to cover basic needs. When that money ran out and I found myself without food, I did what any person in that situation would do — I asked for help. Rather than being supported, I was punished for it. Because I asked for food, I was kicked out. That decision changed the entire direction of my life, and I do not say that lightly.

My social worker failed me completely. At the point when I needed someone to step in and ensure I was safe and supported, nobody did. As a result of that failure, I ended up on the streets. I lived that way for eleven years. Eleven years of having no stability, no safety, and no place to call home. That is not something anyone should have to endure, and it was a direct consequence of the lack of care and intervention I received at a time when I was most vulnerable.

Eventually I was given a flat, and for a brief period it seemed as though things might begin to improve. However, I was evicted from that too, as the bills were not being paid on my behalf as they should have been. Once again, through no real fault of my own, I found myself without a roof over my head. I ended up living in a tent. The sense of hopelessness during that time is something that is very difficult to put into words.

Throughout all of this, I have never been able to settle anywhere. I have carried a deep and persistent sense of isolation for as long as I can remember, and that feeling has not left me even now. I am back in Scotland at present, but I still feel profoundly isolated. Life continues to be a daily struggle.

To make matters worse, years of carrying bags and living without stability has taken a serious physical toll on my body. I now have two slipped discs, which cause me considerable pain and limit what I am able to do. I was supposed to have surgery to address this, but that was cancelled. The physical damage I have sustained is, in many ways, a direct result of the years I spent without a home, without support, and without anyone ensuring that my basic needs were being met.

I deserved better than what I was given. I deserved to be supported, not discarded. The failures of those who were responsible for my care have had consequences that have followed me throughout my entire life, and I am still dealing with them today.
